Even though you can even think of casting notices, you have to read the script again. And again for good measure. Knowing the screenplay cold ensures you not only cast every part you need, but also that you get the right actors for the right part. What are the emotional swings the characters go through? Does a character have to speak with an Irish accent? Does one character have to act through heavy make-up? To ensure you don't miss any characters on your casting notices, be sure to run your screenplay through pre-production software like StudioBinder. StudioBinder's breakdown software lets you tag cast members, extras, props, etc into production element categories. Easily generate breakdown lists you can access at any stage of production. After you've combed through each page of the script and listed out all the characters and extras you need to cast, it's time to write a casting breakdown. Think of it as short character bio, written to grab the attention of actors, agents, and casting directors. It should be informative as it is exciting. It's the heart of your actor's job listing. WHAT IS A CASTING BREAKDOWN? A casting breakdown looks like a short bio, featuring a character's age, ethnicity (if specified), body type, and personality. You should also include any special skills needed. A casting breakdown example looks like this: THE BEAST (Male, 30-40) a prince transformed into a terrifying beast for his lack of compassion. He is hot-tempered and commanding, but has a warm, loving heart buried far beneath his gruff exterior. Must sing. Vocal range: F4 to A2. Does this casting breakdown example make you want to know more about the character? Hopefully. The best casting breakdowns get across all the information, but draw the actor in. When writing your casting breakdown, it's easy to be racist. After all, some films are looking for a certain ethnicity for their project. Unless the script specifies a certain ethnicity, leave the role open. Don't just list "Caucasian Only" for no reason. When you let the casting process guide you, you end up with talent like Samuel Jackson filling the traditional white role of Nick Fury. Before you can print off some warm casting sheets, you need to find space for your open casting call. If you're hiring a casting company, this step is all taken care of. Just send along some audition sides, make sure the casting sheet covers everything you need, and you're in business. If you're doing it yourself, find a space that can accommodate the long lines of actors that will show up to your casting call. You can stagger out the audition times as much as you want, but you're still going to need a huge waiting room. And lots of parking. Make sure there's a reception area where you can your casting sign in sheet. (Casting sign-in sheet template here). You could have the juiciest, most Oscar-worthy part available. But if no one knows about it, you're out of luck. Posting your casting notice gets the word out. Casting notices (or casting call), is your casting breakdown plus general information about your project. Are you looking for NYC SAG-AFTRA actors? Are you looking looking to shoot on location in Rome? You casting call includes all this information and where to show up for the film audition. WHAT IS A CASTING CALL? While not a casting call form template, a casting call usually lists: Production Title Union / Non-Union Status Production Type Project Length Project Format Posted Date Production Location Production Companies Company website Director Producer Casting Director Location Shooting Location Email Compensation Dates and Times of Film Auditions Dates and Times of Callbacks Synopsis of project Character breakdowns Casting notices are sent to agents, and are posted on websites like Backstage. Instead of attaching a casting sheet, these websites collect all the information and headshots you need, so when actors come in, they're ready to go. If you're on a tight budget, reach out to acting schools where actors are often willing to trade money for experience. As actors show up to your open casting call, you have to get information from each of them on a casting sheet. Also known as audition sheets, casting sheets collect all the necessary information from your actors needed to start production. As you watch film audition after film audition, the casting sheet keeps you on track with you're actually seeing. It syncs up with your casting sign in sheet and is basically contact information on steroids. While no two casting sheets are alike, the most information a casting sheet will require is: Name Date of Birth Address (of agency, if repped) Email (of agency, if repped) Agent (if repped) SAG-AFTRA (Y/N) Willing to be an extra? Height Weight Hair Color Eye Color Chest Size Waist Size Shoe Size Of course, no casting sheet is complete without a current headshot and resume. Unless you're shooting a silent film, your actors are going to speak in the final project. As such, you should have audition sides ready to go. Short and to the point, audition sides feature a part of the screenplay that showcases the essence of a character. When posting your casting notice, you should ideally send out audition sides as early possible to give the actors time to work. But just like your casting sheets, you should have them at the film audition ready to go as well. The best audition sides showcase an actor's ability and cut to the core of who the character in the film is. Make sure the person reading sides with the actor across the table, doesn't try to perform. The reader should merely prompt the actor. On every casting sheet is Blank space for you to write your reactions. Was the actor a perfect fit? But for another part? Was someone too fat? Did someone kill their audition sides, but you want to see him up against a girl you saw first in earlier? Mark all of this and more on your casting sheet template so your thoughts stay fresh in your mind. When the last audition sides have been read, all the faces and performances are going to blend together. Writing down specific feedback makes sure your first impressions stay alive.While written notes are great, you should also record every audition. The casting process is one of watching audition sides over and over again until you decide the part's been won.To record the performances properly, designate a mark for your actors to stand on so that you capture the full range of the actor's body language, not just pretty faces.Make sure your actors "slate," or says their name into the camera and shows both profiles before beginning the audition, to make going through the footage easier. Actors may nail a performance, but if they're not able to take direction, they won't be able to work. If your actor isn't delivering what you want, try to get it out. You don't have to give directorial notes. Just suggestions to keep auditions moving and giving every actor a chance to shine.Once your open casting call is through, it's time to go through the tapes. If you don't carefully organize all the data you've collected, your casting notices will be a waste.Develop an organization system to keep track of the audition recordings and casting sheet templates.Create unique folders for every actor and label with the casting sheet. Enter their contact information into a database that you can easily sort if you need to contact them.In StudioBinder, you can easily transfer your casting forms into an intuitive contact database that stores your actors' information. With ample cloud storage, you can share the videos you like with teammates, who can watch audition sides to see if the magic you saw is still there.Maybe you've already figured out what actor you're going with. In any case, your open casting call has become closed.If actors are repped, call their agent to set up a callback appointment. If they aren't, call the preferred number they listed on the audition sheet template.They won't have to fill out a casting sheet on their second-go round, but now you've weeded down the field to the lucky few who may star in your next project. Tip: Use NOT to remove irrelevant results, use OR to add more. If casting directors could hunt the perfect talents for the roles in a snap of an instant if it's a fit or not.2. Create a casting breakdownA casting breakdown is a short bio with the main info about the character - their age, ethnicity, body type, personality, special skills. It's written to give this we have a solution - a casting sheet! Read through to discover what it is and how to nail a casting call in 8 easy steps!Newbie at filmmaking? Learn the basics with our ultimate guide on filmmakingWhat is a casting sheet?A casting sheet is a list with a talent's description for a particular role in a production. Don't mistake it with the cast list, though - if you're unsure, explore all about cast lists here!To help you through the casting process, it has to include some essential information about an actor auditioning for a role:Name:Date of birth:Address (personal or of agency, if repped)Email (personal or of agency, if repped)Agent (if repped)SAG-AFTRA:Willing to be an extra? Ethnicity:Height:Weight:Hair Color:Eye Color:Chest Size:Waist Size:Shoe Size:Special skills:Don't forget to ask the actor to include how current headshot and resume. If they're filling out the casting sheet by hand, you can ask them to bring the printed headshot and resume with them to the audition.If you're offering them to fill it in digitally, then leave some space for a headshot and resume links on Drive or other cloud services.8 steps for doing open casting callsA casting call is an announcement of an open audition. Through casting calls, film directors and producers hunt talents for their upcoming productions.The casting process only looks easy - in fact, it's a thorough process that can take months or preparation and approvals to get your final cast list. However, don't even begin to worry: If you follow these 8 simple steps, you'll nail your casting process!And if you want to simplify the process, even more, download our casting sheet template and have your talents fill it in!Here's what you have to do to prepare:1. Know your script in and outGetting the right actors for the rights part makes it essential for you to know the script almost by heart. You should be able to remember who says what, when, with which attitude and intonation.It's important to remember how you want your characters to be portrayed so that when actors come to audition, you can see at an instant if it's a fit or not.2. Create a casting breakdownA casting breakdown is a short bio with the main info about the character - their age, ethnicity, body type, personality, special skills. It's written to give actors, agents, and casting directors a better perspective and understanding of the character and potential talent for it.Keep in mind: when writing a casting breakdown, you need to describe the role, not the actor. List the traits, emotions, and general vibes you're looking for. Age and ethnicity are mentioned in your breakdown, but only to give you a standing point as to which age range you're seeking.Don't fixate on this too much: sometimes an actor that is slightly older than his character will be more convincing in portrayal than the one who fits the desired age completely.3. Scout a casting spaceThe space where you hunt talents says a lot about you and your production. Find a clean, spacious, modern studio or another space to make sure you're perceived as a professional. Don't try to cut costs on this part if you want to end up with the desired list of actors.You can hire a casting company that will take care of the space search and rent for you. All you need to do in this case is just send some audition sides - we will explain what those are a bit later in the guide.If you're searching for the space yourself, remember that you have to make it comfortable for long lines of actors to wait for their turn. Thus, look for a big waiting room in your potential audition place.4. Post a casting notice!Just as you need to promote your product or service when running a business, the same applies to your audition. No one is going to know it's happening unless you tell the world about it.Casting notices are usually sent to agents, posted on dedicated websites like Backstage, and spread through acting schools, if the production is on a budget.The talent agencies will use your casting call to choose a fitting talent from their database and recommend to you the actors they think are the best for a particular role.5. Ensure actors fill out casting sheetsWhen talents show up to the audition, you have to collect as much information as possible about them - that's where the casting sheet comes in.Get your actors to fill it in as precisely as possible. This will save you time when choosing a talent - with a thorough description at your hands, it will be easier to make a choice.Whether you're having in-person or self-tape auditions (when the talents record their audition and send it), you will need to provide them with audition sides.These are small samples or dialogues and actions the actor has to perform.Audition sides feature a part of the screenplay that portrays the essence of a character. Audition sides showcase the talent's ability to get into the character's core. They have to be short and to the point.7. Record every auditionYou can write notes as the audition goes, but a safer and better option is to record the process. This will help you on a later stage of choosing the right actor for the part - you won't be able to memorize everyone's performance.Designate a mark in the audition room where the talent has to stand, and make sure the camera captures his body fully so that you not only record the facial expressions but also the body language.8. Setup callbacksWhen you are casting, it's important to see as many talents as possible to broaden the pool of actors to choose from. It can happen that you might need to call some actors several times and ask them to perform different scenes to ensure that they're a fit for the role.Callbacks help to cast directors to narrow their search for the perfect talent and make the right choice. If the actors you want to set up for a callback appointment are repped, give a call to their agent. If they work independently, call the number they indicated on the casting sheet.Up next: Explore the pre-production processNow you're ready to hand out your casting sheets and find the most Oscar-winner-looking actor for the role!But wait, is there more to the pre-production process before you're ready to shoot with your talent dream team?Actually, yes! Pre-prod is a whole world to explore, and for a filmmaker, it's vital to understand it as thoroughly as possible. Dive deep into the 7 essential aspects of pre-production with our ultimate guide!
